Abstract:

Psychological maltreatment can be defined as continuous acts serving the purpose of criticizing and weakening the victim in several ways. Gender is a controversial issue in terms of both perpetration and victimization. The study aims to adapt Psychological Maltreatment of Women Inventory developed by Tolman to Turkish culture and examine its psychometric properties in a sample of married women and men in terms of psychological maltreatment victimization. Unlike the original scale, the adapted scale demonstrated four subscales for the Turkish sample: mistreatment, restriction, jealousy, and criticism. Psychological maltreatment subscales were found to differ significantly in terms of various demographic and relational variables. As a result, Turkish form of the Psychological Maltreatment of Women Scale was found to be a reliable and valid instrument to measure the psychological maltreatment experienced by married individuals.
